Depending on the manufacturer and model, the spout can be moved to the cup or the cup on the drip tray can be moved to the spout. Some machines offer programmable outlet heights depending on the selected product. The milk foam produced is either dispensed separately from the coffee spout cup must be moved for preparation, from a milk dispenser directly next to the coffee spout, from a nozzle combined with the coffee spout combined spout or from a separate machine. From a milk container that can be attached to the bean to cup machine. It puts the milk directly into the cup.

Often a so-called Panarello is placed at the end of the steam nozzle. The Panarello leads to the hot steam of cold air into the milk. This causes the milk to foam more without boiling immediately. One differentiates between no display status indication then mostly via LEDs with display with color display with touchscreen with color touchscreen If the display gives a stepbystep instruction, one speaks of Dialogdisplay. This can switch the device on or off at a certain time. In the case of hard water, a water filter is generally recommended to prevent premature calcification of the pipes. Depending on the model and manufacturer, the water filter can be integrated in the water tank or, in the case of a fixed water connection, in front of the unit at the water pipe. Many manufacturers offer a retrofit filter insert for the water tank as an option. If a product output repeat function has been installed, two cups can be placed next to each other and half of each cup can be filled in the first brewing process. This is important so that the coffee does not cool down too much on contact with the cup and thus releases fewer bitter substances. A distinction is made between active and passive cup warmer. Active cup warmer are an additional electric heater to heat the cups. Passive cup warmers use the waste heat from the brewing group to keep the cups at the right temperature. If the machine is not in continuous operation, the cup warmer is often useless in practice because the bean to cup machine must be switched on for a certain time to heat the cups completely. The finer the coffee is ground, the slower the water can be pressed through the coffee grounds. If the pump pressure is variable, the duration of the brewing process can be reduced by increasing the pressure coffee becomes weaker or extended by decreasing it coffee becomes stronger. However, the perfect espresso cannot be achieved because coffee develops its aroma optimally at 9 bar pump pressure. <http://chilli-x.com/image/canon-eos-45d-manual.xml>

Due to higher pump pressure, only more bitter substances are released from the coffee, and too few aromas are released due to lower pressure. The amount of water does not directly influence the aroma of the coffee. Because the more water used, the thinner the coffee simply tastes. Water is heated in a spiralshaped metal tube cast into a metal block. The brewing water temperature is also not as constant as with other systems. Premium machines with extras such as a capuccinator avoid the disadvantages of installing a second thermoblock. Professional machines usually use several parallel singlecircuit systems for steam, brewing water and hot water generation. Disadvantage The construction is expensive and takes longer to reach operating temperature. It does not become as hot as a conical grinder and thus achieves better coffee grounds quality. However, it is usually only found in professional bean to cup machines or pure coffee grinders. The durability of the grinder determines the material used. Ceramic grinders are currently the cheapest to produce. However, a good ceramic grinder can be superior to a lowcost steel alloy. The most expensive to produce is the stainless steel grinder. The theoretically possible number per day is far higher. Household machines are usually designed for a daily capacity of approx. 20 cups. When looking at the daily capacity, one should not forget that approx. 55 cups per day are already over 100,000 cups of coffee after 5 years. If the manufacturer gives a guarantee for the first two years, this means that even after the first six months there is no reversal of the burden of proof and therefore the guarantee is noted here. Despite the guarantee promise, caution is required, because the guarantee conditions differ considerably from manufacturer to manufacturer. Often the power consumption in standby mode does not refer to the average power consumption in standby mode, but only to the time when the device is heated up. Be the first to write one.
